

HISTORY OF WASATCH

In the same year that the 13 colonies revolted against English rule and signed the Declaration of Independence, the first white men traveled through Wasatch valley. At least, this is the earliest recorded date of any visit by white men through this region. Two Franciscan friars, Francisco Antanasio Domingues and Silvestre Velez de Escalante, the famed Father Escalante who explored Utah, started from Santa Fe for the purpose of discovering a direct route to Monterey, California, site of one of their largest missions. They began their journey in July, 1776.

According to descriptions of their journal, they passed through what is now Colorado. They crossed into what is now Utah near White river. The best interpretation of their journal claims they followed Green river for some distance, crossed over to the Duchesne river and followed probably what was the west fork, crossing the mountain at the head of Lake canyon and coming down through Wasatch valley and Provo river to Utah lake.

White trappers undoubtedly traversed the valley in later years, but it was not until 1858, less than a dozen years after the first Mormons came west, that permanent homes and settlements came to Wasatch valley.

This first settlement in 1858 was sparse, limited to less than half a dozen homes in the lower end of the valley. From the journal of John Crook, self-appointed historian and one of the first men ever to settle here, we learn that William M. Wall, George W. Bean, William Meeks, Aaron Daniels and others brought stock and grazed it in the summer of 1858, and also started the construction of ranch homes. Mr. Crook's journal says: "William M. Wall built a ranch at the south end of the valley, Father Decker bought the ranch later known as John Brown's home, Aaron Daniels built a ranch house about two miles north of Daniels, on what later became known as Meeks Bottoms. All of the above parties I think kept some stock through the winter in the valley."

The journal says Father Decker "bought" a place, which would lead one to believe he did not settle that first year of 1858 because there would have been no places to buy from anyone. Several old settlers agree that Wall Meeks and Daniels were the first men to build homes here. Mr.

Crook's journal does not make this point entirely clear, and there is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

Surveys Made

While these ranchers were building homes in the summer and fall of 1858, two survey parties of Provo men, headed by J. C. Snow, visited the valley twice, one in July and once in October, and surveyed two tracts in the north and central portions of the valley, dividing them into 20 acre tracts and claiming all the surveyed plots. They did not settle, however, returning to Utah valley that fall. It is recorded that ice froze half an inch thick in the tin water cups of the July surveying party one night. The party claimed over 100 tracts before summer's end.

Next year, in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, then known as Provo valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kasband, John Jordan, John Carlile Sr., James Carlile, Mr. Carpenter, whose first name was not designated, Jesse Bond, Henry Chawin and William Giles. On the last day of April they started for the valley, taking their wagons apart and carrying them piece by piece over a huge snowslide in Provo canyon. The next day they traveled to William Wall's ranch and reached it the first day of May, 1859.

Mr. Crook's journal of the trip continues:

"Early the next morning we crossed the river and after traveling for about two miles we arrived at Daniels' ranch, where we crossed the creek on ice. We journeyed on about a mile further to Meek's ranch, turned our teams out to feed and concluded to have breakfast. After breakfast was over, we started out on foot in a northerly direction to look out a suitable place for the location of our camp. We found it very difficult to cross Center Creek and Lake Creek because of the drifts of snow which lay in the willows along the banks. In a few hours we arrived at the plat of ground designated for a city; near the place were John M. Murdock's dwelling house now stands."

When Mr. Crook makes reference to the present tense, it should be remembered his account was compiled and written from his journal for the first issues of the Wasatch Wave, in 1889, and it is from there this is taken.

First Soil Turned

"In looking north we saw two dark objects moving along; and after gazing intently for some time we saw that they were moving backwards and forwards. The idea struck us that it was some parties plowing; so off we started to fathom the problem; in drawing near to the objects we found our conjectures to be correct. The first man we reached was William Davidson, with two yoke of cattle and plowing on the twenty acres of land now owned by John Turner in the north field. The other team of two yoke of cattle belonged to Robert Broadhead and James Davis. They were plowing on a piece of ground due east of William Davidson. On inquiry they told us they had been in the valley about two weeks; but on account of a big snow storm now plowing had been done until the day before, which was the first day of May. I think this was the first soil turned over with a plow in the valley. These parties had come from Salt Creek or Nephi, Juab county."

From Mr. Crook's journal, it seems evident that William Wall, Aaron Daniels and William Meeks built the first ranch homes in 1858, and that William Davidson, Robert Broadhead and James Davis were the first farmers in the valley, coming about the middle of April and turning over the first land although Mr. Crook's party of 10 followed them by only two weeks.

Mr. Crook's journal continues: "They were plowing inside of the one and one-half mile square plat of land surveyed the preceding July. This plat of land being already claimed, and our party not feeling desirous of jumping any one's claim, concluded to examine further on up the river. We traveled on about half a mile and found the north line of stakes of said plat, and found some good land just north of it. So we went to work and staked off twenty acres each as near as could be ascertained by stepping off the ground, and concluded to commence plowing immediately. In looking around for a good camping place, we concluded to move our wagons next day, to what is now known as the London spring branch, or John Mc-Donald's spring. After built a large wickup covering it with wild wheat grass and dis known as many as crowded in there of a ing a mammoth affi christened the London hence the name London. The moving and building about two days, and I fifth of May, Thomas and myself, having only of cattle each, joined and commenced plowing.

The party of 10 was entirely English, hence London creek and London. It runs today about north of town. The area known as New London settlers.

Daughter Named Tim
The family of William was believed to be family to settle in the daughter which he named panagos after the month the first white child lived in the valley.

About May 20 of the mer the settlers arrived some of the 10 men Provo for grain and and were accompanied return by quite a number settlers, among them Giles, Hyrum Oaks, M Sydney Epperson, and

About the last of May party arrived. More la yeved, and parties came all summer long acquiring. Some stayed to settle growth and development satch valley had 1 townsites of Heber was this same summer.

An account is contained in Crook's journal.

"Sometime about the June Deputy Surveyor commenced to survey of land that had been town site, the starting George W. Clyde Charles N. Carroll and John Crook were ers. The survey was west line of Main street blocks; thence west half blocks; thence blocks north to the line of survey."

"This section of land ed off in blocks and time, the east part some two months later line, forty rods square laid off at this time. ties moved down on the Donald's spring. After moving we built a large wickup of poles, covering it with willows, long wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there of a night. Being a mammoth affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London Spring. The moving and building occupied about two days, and I think on the fifth of May, Thomas Rasband and myself, having only one yoke of cattle each, joined our teams and commenced plowing."

WASATCH COUNTY

The party of 10 was predominantly English, hence the name London creek and London spring. It runs today about two miles north of town. The area was also known as New London by many settlers.

Daughter Named Timpanogos

The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley. His daughter which he named Timpanogos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

About the last of May another party arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went all summer long acquiring ground. Some stayed to settle, and the growth and development of Wasatch valley had begun. The townsite of Heber was surveyed this same summer.

An account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal.

"Sometime about the middle of June Deputy Surveyor Jesse Fuller commenced to survey the plat of land that had been left for a town site, the starting point being George W. Clyde's corner. Charles N. Carroll and John and John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the west line of Main street for eight blocks; thence west five and a half blocks; thence north eight blocks north to the north field line of survey.

"This section of land was staked off in blocks and lots at this time, the east part of the city some two months later. A fort line, forty rods square, was also laid off at this time. Some parties moved down on the fort line

immediately and commenced to build. John W. Witt, I think, put up the first house. Eliss Cox and John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along."

The fort was forty rods square, four rods being allowed for each family. William Davidson, one of the first three settlers, built his city lot on the block now occupied by the old tithing office.

Good crops of grain were raised that first summer in 1865, although some was lost in a September storm. Most of it was harvested, however. Jesse McCarroll and company brought the first threshing machine from Provo that fall. Settlement spread to the west side of the valley that summer also and farms were established near the mouth of Snake Creek. Peter Shirts began construction of a saw mill at the mouth of Snake Creek.

"There were," Mr. Crook wrote, 17 families in Heber the winter of 1859-60. There were also some families at Midway."

First Winter Uneventful

The settlers' first winter was uneventful, as far as major happenings were concerned. December was clear and cold, and everyone hauled their wood from the canyons.

"Some boys and girls came up from Provo Christmas week on a visit and had a good time," Mr. Crook wrote. "When they returned we felt lonesome."

About 18 inches of snow lay on the ground that winter. During the winter months William Meeks and other men went up Center Creek canyon and brought out timber for sawmill. They began sawing in the fall of 1860, and Mr. Crook claims this was the first sawmill in the valley. Mr. Shirts later completed his mill at Snake Creek and was the second mill in operation.

"About the middle of March, 1860, a number of families arrived from Provo, among whom were Zerira Palmer, T. G. Giles, George Giles, Frederick Giles, George Carlile, Jesse Bond, Jonathan Clegg and others whom I do not remember. Parties kept arriving all the month from Utah county, and by the first of April there were about 40 teams plowing in the north field and Center Creek."

The second summer of the settlers' occupation of Wasatch valley, 1860, saw good fortune remain with them. Crops were good more than doubling the previous year, and ripened earlier in the season. The settlers built a double log house, 20 by 40 feet, with a dirt roof, which they used for a meeting house and school. It was completed enough to hold their Pioneer Day celebration, in it on July 24.

William Meeks, who has served as presiding elder until now, resigned in the fall of 1860 and William Wall was chosen to replace him. He was herding cattle in Round valley, later known as Wallsburg, and came to Heber to accept the position. He chose James Laird and John M. Murdock as his counselors.

"The north and west fields were now closed in nearly to the river by a five-foot worm fence, the south line being about 3 rods south of the present county road to Midway. There were about 4,000 acres in the fields," Mr. Crook wrote.

Fort Soon Filled

The fort lines were all filled up by the fall of 1860, with two families to the four rods formerly allotted one, in many instances. There were over 40 families in

(Continued on another page)

HISTORY OF WASATCH COLONIES

In the same year that the 13 colonies revolted against English rule and signed the Declaration of Independence, the first white men traveled through Wasatch valley. At least, this is the earliest recorded date of any visit by white men through this region. Two Franciscan friars, Francisco Antanasio Dominguez and Silvestre Velez de Escalante, the famed Father Escalante who explored Utah, started from Santa Fe for the purpose of discovering a direct route to Monterey, California, site of one of their largest missions. They began their journey in July, 1776.

According to descriptions of their journal, they passed through what is now Colorado. They crossed into what is now Utah near White river. The best interpretation of their journal claims they followed Green river for some distance, crossed over to the Duchesne river and followed probably what was the west fork, crossing the mountain at the head of Lake canyon and coming down through Wasatch valley and Provo river to Utah lake.

White trappers undoubtedly traversed the valley in later years, but it was not until 1858, less than a dozen years after the first Mormons came west, that permanent homes and settlers came to Wasatch valley.

This first settlement in 1858 was sparse, limited to less than half a dozen homes in the lower end of the valley. From the journal of John Crook, self-appointed historian and one of the first men ever to settle here, we learn that William M. Wall, George W. Bean, William Meeks, Aaron Daniels and others brought stock and grazed it in the summer of 1858, and also started the construction of ranch homes. Mr. Crook's journal says: "William M. Wall built a ranch at the south end of the valley, Father Decker bought the ranch later known as John Brown's home, Aaron Daniels built a ranch house about what miles north of Daniels on what

Crook's journal does not make this point entirely clear, and there is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

Surveys Made

While these ranchers were building homes in the summer and fall of 1858, two survey parties of Provo men, headed by J. C. Snow, visited the valley twice, one in July and once in October, and surveyed two tracts in the north and central portions of the valley, dividing them into 20 acre tracts and claiming all the surveyed plots. They did not serve, however, returning to Utah valley that fall. It is recorded that the ice froze half an inch thick in the tin water cups of the July surveying party one night. The party claimed over 100 tracts before summer's end.

Next year, in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kasband, John Jordan, John Carlisle Sr., James Carlisle, Mr. Carpenter, whose first name was not designated, Jesse Bond, Henry Chawin and William Giles. On the last day of April they started for the valley, taking their wagons apart and carrying them piece by piece over a huge snowslide in Provo canyon. The next day they traveled to William Wall's ranch and reached it the first day of May, 1859.

Mr. Crook's journal of the trip continues:

"Early the next morning we crossed the river and after traveling for about two miles we arrived at Daniels' ranch, where we crossed the creek on ice. We journeyed on about a mile further to Meek's ranch, turned our teams out to feed and concluded to have breakfast. After breakfast was over, we started out on foot in a northerly direction to look out for a suitable place for the location

compiled and written from his journal for the first issues of the Wasatch Wave, in 1889, and it is from there this is taken.

First Soil Turned

"In looking north we saw two dark objects moving along; and after gazing intently for some time we saw that they were moving backwards and forwards. The idea struck us that it was some parties plowing; so off we started to fathom the problem; in drawing near to the objects we found our conjectures to be correct. The first man we reeined was William Davidson, with two yoke of cattle and plowing on the twenty acres of land now owned by John Turner in the north field. The other team of two yoke of cattle belonged to Robert Broadhead and James Davis. They were plowing on a piece of ground due east of William Davidson. On inquiry they told us they had been in the valley about two weeks; but, on account of a big snow storm now plowing had been done until the day before, which was the first day of May. I think this was the first soil turned over with a plow in the valley. These parties had come from Salt Creek or Nephi, Juab county."

From Mr. Crook's journal, it seems evident that William Wall, Aaron Daniels and William Meeks built the first ranch homes in 1858, and that William Davidson, Robert Broadhead and James Davis were the first farmers in the valley, coming about the middle of April and turning over the first land although Mr. Crook's party of 10 followed them by only two weeks.

Mr. Crook's journal continues: "They were plowing inside of the one and one-half mile square plat of land surveyed the preceding July. This plat of land being already claimed, and our party not feeling desirous of jumping any one's claim, concluded to examine further on up the river. We traveled on about half

Donald's spring. After moving we built a large wickup of poles, covering it with willows, long wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there of a night. Being a mammoth affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London Spring. The moving and building occupied about two days, and I think on the fifth of May, Thomas Rasband and myself, having only one yoke of cattle each, joined our teams and commenced plowing."

The party of 10 was predominantly English, hence the name London creek and London spring. It runs today about two miles north of town. The area was also known as New London by many settlers.

Daughter Named Timpangos
The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley. His daughter which he named Timpangos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others. About the last of May another party arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went all summer long acquiring ground. Some stayed to settle, and the growth and development of Wasatch valley had begun. The townsite of Heber was surveyed this same summer.

An account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal.

"Sometime about the middle of June Deputy Surveyor Jesse Fuller commenced to survey the plat of land that had been left for a town site, the starting point being George W. Clyde's corner. Charles N. Carroll and John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the immediately and commenced to build. John W. Witt, I think, put up the first house. Eliss Cox and John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along."

The fort was forty rods square, four rods being allowed for each family. William Davidson, one of the first three settlers, built his city lot on the block now occupied by the old tithing office.

Good crops of grain were raised that first summer in 1859, although some was lost in a September storm. Most of it was harvested, however. Jesse McCarroll and company brought the first threshing machine from Provo that fall. Settlement spread to the west side of the valley that summer also and farms were established near the mouth of Snake Creek. Peter Shirts began construction of a saw mill at the mouth of Snake Creek.

"There were," Mr. Crook wrote, "17 families in Heber the winter of 1859-60. There were also some families at Midway."

First Winter Uneventful

The settlers' first winter was uneventful, as far as major happenings were concerned. December was clear and cold, and everyone hauled their wood from the canyons.

"Some boys and girls came up from Provo Christmas week on a visit and had a good time," Mr. Crook wrote. "When they returned we felt lonesome."

About 18 inches of snow lay on the ground that winter. During the winter months William Meeks and other men went up Center Creek canyon and brought out timber for sawmill. They began sawing in the fall of 1860, and Mr. Crook claims this was the first sawmill in the valley. Mr. Shirts later completed his mill at Snake Creek and was the second mill in operation.

"About the middle of March, 1860, a number of families arrived from Provo, among whom were Zerita Palmer, T. G. Giles, George J. Palmer, Frederick Giles, George year, and season. The le log house meeting he completed Pioneer D. July 24.

William as pres resigned in William V place him. in Round Wallsburg, accept th James Lai practical ing to c vice sta

Hist Wa

the fort on their "In th 1859," th all the Camp F valley. the winter months William Meeks covers, vegetable, al we g us with wearing in those they wer had con old wago shoes we nearly o used to p jar but i got to th

HISTORY OF WASATCH COUNTY

In the same year that the 13 colonies revolted against English rule and signed the Declaration of Independence, the first white men traveled through Wasatch valley. At least, this is the earliest recorded date of any visit by white men through this region. Two Franciscan friars, Francisco Antanasio Domingues and Silvestre Velez de Escalante, the famed Father Escalante who explored Utah, started from Santa Fe for the purpose of discovering a direct route to Monterey, California, site of one of their largest missions. They began their journey in July, 1776.

According to descriptions of their journal, they passed through what is now Colorado. They crossed into what is now Utah near White river. The best interpretation of their journal claims they followed Green river for some distance, crossed over to the Duchesne river and followed probably what was the west fork crossing the mountain at the head of Lake canyon and coming down through Wasatch valley and Provo river to Utah lake.

White trappers undoubtedly traversed the valley in later years, but it was not until 1858, less than a dozen years after the first Mormons came west, that permanent homes and settlers came to Wasatch valley.

This first settlement in 1858 was sparse, limited to less than half a dozen homes in the lower end of the valley. From the journal of John Crook, self-appointed historian and one of the first men ever to settle here, we learn that William M. Wall, George W. Bean, William Meeks, Aaron Daniels and others brought stock and grazed it in the summer of 1858, and also started the construction of ranch homes. Mr. Crook's journal says: "William M. Wall built a ranch at the south end of the valley, Father Decker bought the ranch later known as John Brown's home, Aaron Daniels built a ranch house about two miles north of Daniels, on what later became known as Meeks Bottoms. All of the above parties I think kept some stock through the winter in the valley."

The journal says Father Decker "bought" a place, which would lead one to believe he did not

Crook's journal does not make this point entirely clear, and there is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

While these ranchers were building homes in the summer and fall of 1858, two survey parties of Provo men, headed by J. C. Snow, visited the valley twice, one in July and once in October, and surveyed two tracts in the north and central portions of the valley, dividing them into 20 acre tracts and claiming all the surveyed plots. They did not serve, however, returning to Utah valley that fall. It is recorded that ice froze half an inch thick in the tin water cups of the July surveying party one night. The party claimed over 100 tracts before summer's end.

Next year in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, then known as Provo valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Randall, John Jordan, John Carlisle Sr., James Carlie, Mr. Carpenter, whose first name was not designated, Jesse Bond, Henry Chawin and William Giles. On the last day of April they started for the valley, taking their wagons apart and carrying them piece by piece over a huge snowslide in Provo canyon. The next day they traveled to William Wall's ranch and reached it the first day of May, 1859.

Mr. Crook's journal of the trip continues:

"Early the next morning we crossed the river and after traveling for about two miles we arrived at Daniels' ranch, where we crossed the creek on ice. We journeyed on about a mile further to Meek's ranch, turned our teams out to feed and concluded to have breakfast. After breakfast was over, we started out on foot in a northerly direction to look out for a suitable place for the location of our camp. We found it very difficult to cross Center Creek and Lake Creek because of the drifts of snow which lay in the willows along the banks. In a few hours we arrived at the flat of ground designated for a city.

compiled and written from his journal for the first issues of the Wasatch Wave, in 1889, and it is from there this is taken.

First Soil Turned

"In looking north we saw two dark objects moving along; and after gazing intently for some time we saw that they were moving backwards and forwards. The idea struck us that it was some parties plowing; so off we started to fathom the problem: in drawing near to the objects we found our conjectures to be correct. The first man we reached was William Davidson, with two yoke of cattle and plowing on the twenty acres of land now owned by John Turner in the north field. The other team of two yoke of cattle belonged to Robert Broadhead and James Davis. They were plowing on a piece of ground due east of William Davidson. On inquiry they told us they had been in the valley about two weeks; but on account of a big snow storm now plowing had been done until the day before, which was the first day of May. I think this was the first soil turned over with a plow in the valley. These parties had come from Salt Creek or Nephi jub county."

From Mr. Crook's journal, it seems evident that William Wall, Aaron Daniels and William Meeks built the first ranch homes in 1858, and that William Davidson, Robert Broadhead and James Davis were the first farmers in the valley, coming about the middle of April and turning over the first land although Mr. Crook's party of 10 followed them by only two weeks.

Mr. Crook's journal continues: "They were plowing inside of the one and one-half mile square plat of land surveyed the preceding July. This plat of land being already claimed, and our party not feeling desirous of jumping any one's claim, concluded to examine further on up the river. We traveled on about half a mile and found the north line of stakes of said plat, and found some good land just north of it. So we went to work and staked off twenty acres each as near as could be ascertained by stepping off the ground, and concluded to Donald's spring. After moving we built a large wickup of poles, covering it with willows, long wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there of a night. Being a mammoth affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London Spring. The moving and building occupied about two days, and I think on the fifth of May, Thomas Rasband and myself, having only one yoke of cattle each, joined our teams and commenced plowing."

The party of 10 was predominantly English, hence the name London creek and London spring. It runs today about two miles north of town. The area was also known as New London by many settlers.

Daughter Named Timpanogos
The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley, his daughter which he named Timpanogos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

About the last of May another party arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went all summer long acquiring ground. Some stayed to settle, and the growth and development of Wasatch valley had begun. The townsfolk of Heber was surveyed this same summer.

An account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal.

"Sometime about the middle of June Deputy Surveyor Jesse Fuller commenced to survey the plat of land that had been left for a town site, the starting point being George W. Clyde's corner.

Charles N. Carroll and John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the west line of Main street for eight blocks; thence west five and a half blocks; thence north eight blocks north to the north field line of survey.

"This section of land was stakimmediately and commenced to build. John W. Witt, I think, put up the first house. Eliss Cox and John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along."

The fort was forty rods square, four rods being allowed for each family. William Davidson, one of the first three settlers, built his city lot on the block now occupied by the old tithing office.

Good crops of grain were raised that first summer in 1859, although some was lost in a September storm. Most of it was harvested, however. Jesse McCarroll and company brought the first threshing machine from Provo that fall. Settlement spread to the west side of the valley that summer also and farms were established near the mouth of Snake Creek. Peter Shirts began construction of a saw mill at the mouth of Snake Creek.

"There were," Mr. Crook wrote, "17 families in Heber the winter of 1859-60. There were also some families at Midway."

The settlers' first winter was uneventful, as far as major happenings were concerned. December was clear and cold, and everybody hauled their wood from the canyons.

"Some boys and girls came up from Provo Christmas week on a visit and had a good time," Mr. Crook wrote. "When they returned we felt lonesome."

About 18 inches of snow lay on the ground that winter. During the winter months William Meeks and other men went up Center Creek canyon and brought out timber for sawmill. They began sawing in the fall of 1860, and Mr. Crook claims this was the first sawmill in the valley. Mr. Shirts later completed his mill at Snake Creek and was the second mill in operation.

"About the middle of March, 1860, a number of families arrived from Provo, among whom were Zerina Palmer, T. G. Giles, George Giles, Frederick Giles, George Carlie, Jesse Bond, Jonathan Clegg and others whom I do not remember. Parties kept arriving all the month from Utah county, and by the first of April there were about 40 teams plowing in year, and season. The log house, dirt roof, meaning how completed.

Pioneer Day July 24.

William resigned in place him. in Round Wallsburg, accept the James Lair

Hist Was

the fort in 1859, the all the first Camp Pio teamsters covers, so vegetables that we got us with a wearing a in those d they were had conveyed old wagon shoes we h nearly out used to pre jar' but un Giles, got to the glad to 'pre shoes, for much like our bare fe Historian put a sense

卷之四

Crook's journal does not make this point entirely clear, and there is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

Surveys Made

While these ranchers were building homes in the summer and fall of 1858, two survey parties of Provo men, headed by J. C. Snow, visited the valley twice, once in July and once in October, and surveyed two tracts in the north and central portions of the valley, dividing them into 20 acre tracts and claiming all the surveyed plots. They did not ser-

Survived, however, returning to Utah valley that fall. It is recorded that ice froze half an inch thick in the tin water cups of the July surveying party one night. The party claimed over 100 tracts before summer's end.

Next year, in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, then known as Provo valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Rasband, John Jordan, John Carille Sr., James Carille, Mr. Carpenter, whose first name was not designated, Jesse Bond, Henry Chawin and William Giles. On the last day of April they started for the valley, taking their wagons apart and carrying them piece by piece over a huge snowslide in Provo canyon. The next day they traveled to William Wall's ranch and reached it the first day of May, 1859.

Mr. Crook's journal of the trip continues:

"Early the next morning we crossed the river and after traveling for about two miles we arrived at Daniels' ranch, where we crossed the creek on ice. We four neved on about a mile further to Meek's ranch, turned our teams out to feed and concluded to have breakfast. After breakfast was over, we started out on foot in a northerly direction to look out a suitable place for the location of our camp. We found it very difficult to cross Center Creek and Lake Creek because of the drifts of snow which lay in the grew in more of a hurry, and being a mammoth affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London Spring. The moving and building occupied about two days, and I think on the fifth of May, Thomas Rasband and myself, having only one yoke of cattle each, joined our teams and commenced plowing."

Donald's spring. After moving we built a large wickup of poles, covering it with willows, long wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there at night. Re-

The party of 10 was predominantly English, hence the name London creek and London spring. It runs today about two miles north of town. The area was also known as New London by many settlers.

Daughter Named Timpanogos
The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley. His daughter which he named Timpanogos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new

about the last of May another party arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went all summer long acquiring ground. Some slaved to settle, and the growth and development of Wascatch valley had begun. The townsite of Heber was surveyed this same summer.

An account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal.

town site, the starting point being George W. Clyde's corner. Charles N. Carroll and John and John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the year, and this season. The log house dirt roof. The meeting house completed.

"This section of land was stake-

Pioneer Day
July 24.
William T ed as presi resigned in William W

place him.
in Round v Walsburg, accept the James Laird

practical ing to vice stat

First was the fort in on their c

"In the 1859," the all the fre
Camp Flou

valley. As teamsters covers, so vegetables ial we got

...wearing a in those d they were had conva pants and old weapon

shoes we h nearly out used to pre jar' but und got to the shoes, for much like our bare fe Historian out a sense

near that the 15 against English station the white research his is earliest visit by any of this region. frans, Francisco agnes and Silves alante, the famed who explored on Santa Fe for discovering a di- here, California, their largest mis- fan their journey

Crook's journal does not make this point entirely clear, and there is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

compiled and written from his journal for the first issues of the Wasatch Wave, in 1889, and it is from there this is taken.

Donald's spring. After moving we built a large wickup of poles, covering it with willows, long wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there of a night. Being a mammoth affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London Spring.

immediately and commenced to build. John W. Witt, I think, put up the first house. Bliss Cox and John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along.

year, and ripened earlier in the season. The settlers built a double log house, 20 by 40 feet, with a dirt roof, which they used for a meeting house and school. It was completed enough to hold their Pioneer Day celebration. in it on July 24.

dock as his connectors. "The north and west fields were now closed in nearly to the river by a live-foot worn fence, the south line being about 80 rods south of the present county road to Midway. There were about 4,000 acres in the fields," Mr. Crook wrote.

descriptions of ay passed through prado. They cross- now Utah near- best interpreta- tional claims they- river for some dis- over to the Du- and followed prob- the west fork, untain at the head and coming down in valley and Pro- in lake.

settlers. The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley, this daughter which he named Timpanogos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

James Laird and John M. Mur-

(Continued on another page)

Next year, in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, then known as Provo valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kar-

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

Provo valley, then known as Wasatch valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kar-settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

Provo valley, then known as Wasatch valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kar-

settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

Provo valley, then known as Wasatch valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kar-

settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

Provo valley, then known as Wasatch valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Kar-

settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

History of Wasatch

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

the second winter of the winter, 1860-61, was about same as the first one. The following summer, their third, began in April, and the annual grain planted was double the previous season. The kept coming in from other men and were forced to on city lots, the old fort being completely filled dwellings.

true and signed the declaration of Independence, the first white men traveled through Wasatch valley. At least, this is the earliest recorded date of any visit by white men through this region. Two Franciscan friars, Francisco Antanasio Dominguez and Silvestre Velez de Escalante, the famed Father Escalante who explored Utah, started from Santa Fe for the purpose of discovering a direct route to Monterey, California, site of one of their largest missions. They began their journey in July, 1776.

According to descriptions of their journal, they passed through what is now Colorado. They crossed into what is now Utah near White river. The best interpretation of their journal claims they followed Green river for some distance, crossed over to the Duchesne river and followed probably what was the west fork, crossing the mountain at the head of Lake canyon and coming down through Wasatch valley and Provo river to Utah lake.

White trappers undoubtedly traversed the valley in later years, but it was not until 1858, less than a dozen years after the first Mormons came west, that permanent homes and settlers came to Wasatch valley.

This first settlement in 1858 was sparse, limited to less than half a dozen homes in the lower end of the valley. From the journal of John Crook, self-appointed historian and one of the first men ever to settle here, we learn that William M. Wall, George W. Bean, William Meeks, Aaron Daniels and others brought stock and grazed it in the summer of 1858, and also started the construction of ranch homes. Mr. Crook's journal says: "William M. Wall built a ranch at the south end of the valley, Father Decker bought the ranch, later known as John Brown's home. Aaron Daniels built a ranch house about two miles north of Daniels, on what later became known as Meeks Bottoms. All of the above parties I think kept some stock through the winter in the valley."

The journal says Father Decker "bought" a place, which would lead one to believe he did not settle that first year of 1858 because there would have been no places to buy from anyone. Several old settlers agree that Wall Meeks and Daniels were the first men to build homes here. Mr.

the point entirely clear, and is little else written on the subject that could be considered authoritative.

While these ranchers were building homes in the summer and fall of 1858, two survey parties of Provo men, headed by J. C. Snow, visited the valley twice, one in July and once in October, and surveyed two tracts in the north and central portions of the valley, dividing them into 20 acre tracts and claiming all the surveyed plots. They did not serve, however, returning to Utah valley that fall. It is recorded that the ice froze half an inch thick in the thin water cups of the July surveying party one night. The party claimed over 100 tracts before summer's end.

Next year, in the spring of 1859 a group of Provo men, one of whom was Mr. Crook, started for Wasatch valley, then known as Provo valley, to settle there. The party included, besides Mr. Crook, Charles N. Carroll, Thomas Russell, John Jordan, John Carille Sr., James Carille, Mr. Carpen-ter, whose first name was not designated, Jesse Bond, Henry Chawin and William Giles. On the last day of April they started for the valley, taking their wagons apart and carrying them piece by piece over a huge snowslide in Provo canyon. The next day they traveled to William Wall's ranch and reached it the first day of May, 1859.

Mr. Crook's journal of the trip continues:

"Early the next morning we crossed the river and after traveling for about two miles we arrived at Daniels' ranch, where we crossed the creek on ice. We journeyed on about a mile further to Meek's ranch, turned our teams out to feed and concluded to have breakfast. After breakfast was over, we started out on foot in a northerly direction to look out a suitable place for the location of our camp. We found it very difficult to cross Center Creek and Lake Creek because of the drifts of snow which lay in the willows along the banks. In a few hours we arrived at the plat of ground designated for a city; near the place were John M. Murdock's dwelling house now stands."

When Mr. Crook makes reference to the present tense, it should be remembered his account was the Wasatch Wave, in 1889, and it is from there this is taken. First Soil Turned

"In looking north we saw two dark objects moving along; and after gazing intently for some time we saw that they were moving backwards and forwards. The idea struck us that it was some parties plowing; so off we started to fathom the problem; in drawing near to the objects we found our conjectures to be correct. The first man we recognized was William Davidson, with two yoke of cattle and plowing on the twenty acres of land now owned by John Turner in the north field. The other team of two yoke of cattle belonged to Robert Broadhead and James Davidson. They were plowing on a piece of ground due east of William Davidson. On inquiry they told us they had been in the valley about two weeks; but on account of a big snow storm now plowing had been done until the day before, which was the first day of May. I think this was the first soil turned over with a plow in the valley. These parties had come from Salt Creek or Nephi, Juab county."

From Mr. Crook's journal, it seems evident that William Wall, Aaron Daniels and William Meeks built the first ranch homes in 1858, and that William Davidson, Robert Broadhead and James Davis were the first farmers in the valley, coming about the middle of April and turning over the first land although Mr. Crook's party of 10 followed them by only two weeks.

Mr. Crook's journal continues:

"They were plowing inside of the one and one-half mile square plat of land surveyed the preceding July. This plat of land being already claimed, and our party not feeling desirous of jumping any one's claim, concluded to examine further on up the river. We traveled on about half a mile and found the north line of stakes of said plat, and found some good land just north of it. So we went to work and staked off twenty acres each as near as could be ascertained by stepping off the ground, and concluded to commence plowing immediately. In looking around for a good camping place, we concluded to move our wagons next day, to what is now known as the London spring branch, or John Mc-covering it with willows, wheat grass and dirt. I have known as many as 30 persons crowded in there of a night. Being a memorable affair, it was christened the London wickup, hence the name London. Spring. The moving and building occupied about two days, and I think on the fifth of May, Thomas Hasbard and myself, having only one yoke of cattle each, joined our teams and commenced plowing."

The party of 10 was predominantly English, hence the name London creek and London spring. It runs today about two miles north of town. The area was also known as New London by many settlers.

The family of William Davidson was believed to be the first family to settle in the valley, first daughter which he named Timpanogos after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

About May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, some of the 10 men returned to Provo for grain and supplies, and were accompanied on their return by quite a number of new settlers, among them Thomas H. Giles, Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Sydney Epperson, and others.

About the last of May another party arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went all summer long acquiring ground. Some stayed to settle, and the growth and development of Wasatch valley had begun. The townsie of Heber was surveyed this same summer.

An account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal.

"Sometime about the middle of June Deputy Surveyor Jesse Fullier commenced to survey the plat of land that had been left for a town site, the starting point being George W. Clyde's corner. Charles N. Carroll and John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the west line of Main street for eight blocks; thence west five and a half blocks; thence north eight blocks north to the north field line of survey."

"This section of land was staked off in blocks and lots at this time, the east part of the city some two months later. A forty line, forty rods square, was also laid off at this time. Some parties moved down on the fort line

John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along. The fort was forty rods square, four rods being allowed for each family. William Davidson, one of the first three settlers, built his city lot on the block now occupied by the old tiling office.

Good crops of grain were raised that first summer in 1859, although some was lost in a September storm. Most of it was harvested, however. Jesse McCarroll and company brought the first threshing machine from Provo that fall. Settlement spread to the west side of the valley that summer also and farms were established near the mouth of Snake Creek. Peter Shirts began construction of a saw mill at the mouth of Snake Creek.

"There were," Mr. Crook wrote, "families in Heber the winter of 1859-60. There were also some families at Midway."

The settlers' first winter was uneventful, as far as major happenings were concerned. December was clear and cold, and every one hauled their wood from the canyons.

"Some boys and girls came up from Provo Christmas week on a visit and had a good time," Mr. Crook wrote. "When they returned we felt lonesome."

About 18 inches of snow lay on the ground that winter. During the winter months William Meeks and other men went up Center Creek canyon and brought out timber for sawmill. They began sawing in the fall of 1860, and Mr. Crook claims this was the first sawmill in the valley. Mr. Shirts later completed his mill at Snake Creek and was the second mill in operation.

"About the middle of March, 1860, a number of families arrived from Provo, among whom were Zezra Palmer, T. G. Giles, George Giles, Frederick Giles, Jonathan Carille, Jesse Bond, Jonathan Clegg and others whom I do not remember. Parties kept arriving all the month from Utah county, and by the first of April there were about 40 teams plowing in the north field and Center Creek."

The second summer of the settlers' occupation of Wasatch valley, 1860, saw good fortune; rain main with them. Crops were good more than doubling the previous meeting house completed the pioneer Day

July 24. William N. ed as presi resigned in William W. place him. in Round v Wallsburg, accept the James Lar practically ing to co vice stath

Hist Was

the fort l on their "In the 1859" the all the fr Camp Flo teamsters A covers, s vegetable us we go wearing in those they were had con pants and old wagon shoes we nearly on used to pr jar but in got to the Giles, George glad to "p shoes, for remember. Parties kept arriving much like our bare f Historian out a sens by the fol "When wore out I make us on! excus

COUNTY

ed k, put ox and ar beers folsquare, or each one of uilt his occupied re rais-369, at-a Sep-as har-Carroll
ne first Provo d to the at sumestab-
Snake an con-at the k wrote, winter so some ter was for hap-Decemd every-from the came up eek on a ne," Mr. return-w lay on During n Meeks
o Center ight out y began 860, and was the lley. Mr. is mill at e second f M s ar om w s, George George
Jonathan
I do not arriving n county, ril there

ear, and ripened earlier in the season. The settlers built a double log house, 20 by 40 feet, with a dirt roof, which they used for a meeting house and school. It was completed enough to hold their Pioneer Day celebration, in it on July 24.

William Meeks, who has served as presiding elder until now, resigned in the fall of 1860 and William Wall was chosen to replace him. He was herding cattle in Round valley, later known as Wallsburg, and came to Heber to accept the position. He chose James Laird and John M. Murdock as his counselors.

"The north and west fields were now closed in nearly to the river by a five-foot worm fence, the south line being about 80 rods south of the present county

Wild game was plentiful. A herd of 17 antelope skirting the edge of the settlement, a large bear that wandered right into town and was shot, a herd of elk who came down from the hills and were trapped in the snow and all killed by settlement hunters—these among the recollections of those first years in the valley.

The second winter of the settlement, 1860-61, was about the same as the first one. The following summer, their third, plowing began in April, and the amount of grain planted was doubled over the previous season. Families kept coming in from other settlements and were forced to build on city lots, the old fort by now being completely filled with dwellings.

Military District Organized
In September, 1861, officers came to Heber and organized it into a military district. J. W. Witt was appointed major and John Hamilton adjutant over the division of militia, with Thomas Todd captain of infantry.

"William M. Wall was a great hand for conducting sham fights, we had many a one in the midday of the fort, cavalry against infantry. I remember one time we were having a sham fight, the infantry was charging the cavalry when the horses got frightened and ran across the ditch, Charles Thomas' horse threw him and put his shoulder out of joint and he is still lame in that arm. There was no more sham fighting that day."

During the winter of 1861-62 a home drama association was formed, with Elisha Everett Sr. manager and John Hamilton, secretary. They used quilts and blankets for wings and scenery. Later they began building a stone hall in which to stage plays, but it was never finished because of friction which developed when some claimed they were building a theater before they built a house of worship. The company continued to perform.

Historian Crook was not with some up at Hailstone."

Indian War Reaches Wasatch

The Black Hawk Indian war spread to Wasatch valley in 1866. The three settlements in the west side of the valley merged into one and the name of the town, Midway, resulted. They settled at the middle community and built a fort.

Although no white person was killed or wounded by Indians in this valley during the Black Hawk war, much stock was driven off, killed and stolen. The threat was always present and only constant vigilance and armed strength prevented blood shed. More than 250 men were organized into active military duty, in two companies of cavalry and four of infantry. William Wall's cavalry had several brushes with the Indians, and in one skirmish they killed two redskins and wounded several more. Raids on cattle and other stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the north by Summit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1889, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, having a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural population, with farming and livestock raising as the chief occupations, continued until the mines began to open and employ great numbers of men in the late 1920's. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch county still remains a leading livestock center, however, with dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine sheep are perhaps the county's best known product, an industry that has been built up from the first days of the valley's settlement.

Wasatch county stands today as one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

MR. MERCHANT
SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 17 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to everyone, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small quiet was held was built on the city lot owned by Ann Howarth, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south front.

The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowery outside. The menu consisted of Lee did not raise any crop the first year.

"Christmas week was a gay time. After the banquet, a party of young folks arrived, some three or four sleigh loads from Provo City. Most of the young people, especially the boys had been in the valley in the summer and had harvested some grain on Center Creek. There were gay times when they arrived, with dancing and amusements. About New Years they returned home. Then we were left with no mail and no visitors and clear, cold weather prevailed. Snow was about 18 inches deep."

VASATCH COUNTY

After moving we took a pickup of poles, long grass and dirt. I have as many as 30 persons in there of a night. Being in there of a night, it was a mammoth affair, it was the London wickup, the name London Spring, owing and building occupied two days, and I think on the day of May, Thomas Rasband and myself, having only one yoke each, joined our teams in the wickup.

Party of 10 was predominant in English, hence the name in creek and London spring. as today about two miles of town. The area was also as New London by many.

Named Timpanogos family of William David, as believed to be the first to settle in the valley. His son after the mountain, was the first white child born in the valley.

May 20 of the same summer the settlers arrived, 1859, of the 10 men returned to for grain and supplies, were accompanied on their way by quite a number of new arrivals, among them Thomas H. Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, Hyrum Oaks, and others.

Epiphany, and others. arrived. More land was surveyed, and parties came and went in the long acquiring ground. stayed to settle, and the valley had begun. The site of Heber was surveyed same summer.

account is contained in Mr. Crook's journal. sometime about the middle of Deputy Surveyor Jesse Full, commenced to survey the plat and that had been left for a starting point between W. Clyde's corner. John Crook were chain bearers. The survey was run on the line of Main street for eight blocks; thence north eight blocks; thence north to the north field of survey.

of survey. section of land was stalk-

Immediately and commenced to build. John W. Witt, I think, put up the first house. Ellis Cox and John Hamilton were not far behind with his house. Others followed suit right along.

The fort was forty rods square, four rods being allowed for each family. William Davidson, one of the first three settlers, built his city lot on the block now occupied by the old tithing office. Good crops of grain were raised that first summer in 1859, although some was lost in a September storm. Most of it was harvested, however. Jesse McCarroll and company brought the first threshing machine from Provo that fall. Settlement spread to the west side of the valley that summer also and farms were established near the mouth of Snake Creek. Peter Shirts began construction of a saw mill at the mouth of Snake Creek.

"There were," Mr. Crook wrote, 17 families in Heber the winter of 1859-60. There were also some families at Midway."

First Winter Uneventful The settlers' first winter was uneventful, as far as major happenings were concerned. December was clear and cold, and everybody hauled their wood from the canyons.

"Some boys and girls came up from Provo Christmas week on a visit and had a good time," Mr. Crook wrote. "When they returned we felt lonesome."

About 18 inches of snow lay on the ground that winter. During the winter months William Meeks and other men went up Center Creek canyon and brought out timber for sawmill. They began sawing in the fall of 1860, and Mr. Crook claims this was the first sawmill in the valley. Mr. Shirts later completed his mill at Snake Creek and was the second mill in operation.

"About the middle of March, 1860, a number of families arrived from Provo, among whom were Zerita Palmer, T. G. Giles, George Giles, Frederick Giles, George Carille, Jesse Bond, Jonathan Carille, and others whom I do not remember. Parties kept arriving all the month from Utah county, and by the first of April there were about 40 teams plowing in the valley.

year, and ripened earlier in the season. The settlers built a double log house, 20 by 40 feet, with a dirt roof, which they used for a meeting house and school. It was completed enough to hold their Pioneer Day celebration. In it on July 24.

William Meeks, who has served as presiding elder until now, resigned in the fall of 1860 and William Wall was chosen to replace him. He was herding cattle in Round valley, later known as Wallsburg, and came to Heber to accept the position. He chose James Laird and John M. Mur-

Lee did not raise any crop first year. "Christmas week was a time. After the banquet, a of young folks arrived, three or four sleigh loads Provo City. Most of the people, especially the boys, been in the valley in the summer.

stock raising as the chief occupation, continued until the mines began to open and employ great numbers of men in the late 1920's. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch livestock center, however, with dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine sheep are perhaps the county's best known product, an industry that has been built up from the first days of the valley's settlement.

one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

Wasatch county was officially organized in 1862 by an act of the legislature, bounded on the north by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the east by the Snake river, on the south by the Colorado river, and on the west by the Utah county line. John W. Witt was appointed major and John Hamilton adjutant over the division of militia, with Thomas Toole captain of infantry.

"William M. Wall was a great hand for conducting sham fights. We had many a one in the middle of the fort, cavalry against infantry. I remember one time we were having a sham fight, the infantry was charging the cavalry when the horses got frightened and ran across the ditch. Captain Thomas' horse threw him and he is still lame in that arm. There was no more sham fighting day."

During the winter of 1860, a home drama association formed, with Eliza Everett as manager and John Hamilton as retary. They used quilts and quilts for wings and scenery. er they began building a hall in which to stage plays. It was never finished because of friction which developed between some claimed they were a theater before they built a hall. The drama association continued, however, and Heber's families' quiet was held was built on the same city lot owned by Ann Howarth, with a bowerly on the south front. The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowerly outside. The menu consisted of of survey.

MR. MERCHANT

SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

Heber's families' quiet was held was built on the same city lot owned by Ann Howarth, with a bowerly on the south front. The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowerly out-

— THE WASATCH WAVE —

ton, some in Round Valley and some up at Hailstone." Indian War Reaches Wasatch

The Black Hawk Indian war spread to Wasatch valley in 1866. The three settlements in the west side of the valley merged into one and the name of the town, Midway, resulted. They settled at the middle community and built a fort.

Although no white person was killed or wounded by Indians in this valley during the Black Hawk war much stock was driven off, killed and stolen. The threat was always present and only constant vigilance and armed strength prevented blood shed. More than 250 men were organized into active military duty, in two companies of cavalry and four of infantry. William Wall's cavalry had several brushes with the Indians, and in one skirmish they killed two redskins and wounded several more. Raids on cattle and other stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the north by Summit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1889, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, having a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural population, with farming and stock raising as the chief occupations, continued until the mid 1890s when the mines began to open and employ large numbers of men in the late 19th century. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch county still remains a leading livestock center, however, dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine stock are perhaps the county's known product, an industry has been built up from the days of the valley's settlement.

Wasatch county stands today as one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

Wild game was plentiful. A herd of 17 antelope skirting the edge of the settlement, a large bear that wandered right into town and was shot, a herd of elk who came down from the hills and were trapped in the snow and all killed by settlement hunters—these among the recollections of those first years in the valley.

The second winter of the settlement, 1860-61, was about the same as the first one. The following summer, their third, plowing began in April, and the amount of grain planted was doubled over the previous season. Families kept coming in from other settlements and were forced to build on city lots, the old fort by now being completely filled with dwellings.

Military District Organized

In September, 1861, officers came to Heber and organized it into a military district. J. W. Witt was appointed major and John Hamilton adjutant over the division of militia, with Thomas Todd captain of infantry.

"William M. Wall was a great hand for conducting sham fights, we had many a one in the middle of the fort, cavalry against infantry. I remember one time we were having a sham fight, the infantry was charging the cavalry when the horses got frightened and ran across the ditch, Charles Thomas' horse threw him and put his shoulder out of joint and he is still lame in that arm. There was no more sham fighting that day."

During the winter of 1861-62 a home drama association was formed, with Elisha Everett Sr. manager and John Hamilton, secretary. They used quilts and blankets for wings and scenery. Later they began building a stone hall in which to stage plays, but it was never finished because of friction which developed when some claimed they were building a theater before they built a house of worship. The company continued, however, and gave plays year after year.

"By 1862 our population had increased to near 1,000 souls. Midway had three small settlements. Quite a few families had settled on Center creek, some at Charles-

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

History of Wasatch

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

"In the summer and fall of 1859," the journal continues, "most all the freight teams enroute to Camp Floyd passed through this valley. As they passed by the teamsters would swap old wagon-covers, seamless sacks, etc., for vegetables and grain. The material we got in this way furnished us with about all the common wearing apparel we could get in those days, and men, though they were well dressed when they had canvas suits, consisting of pants and jumper, made from an old wagon sheet. What boots and shoes we had, though boots were nearly out of the question, we used to preserve, not in a 'mason's jar' but under our arms until we got to the field, when we were glad to 'preserve' our feet in old shoes, for the stubble was too much like pins and needles for our bare feet."

Historian Crook was not with out a sense of humor, as proved by the following:

"When the soles of our shoes wore out Bro. Jonathan C. would make us some wooden bottoms. Oh! excuse me, I mean soles."

MR. MERCHANT
SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 17 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to everyone, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small, and it was impossible to invite more. Those invited were Thomas Rasband, James and Bessie Carlile, Charles N. Carroll, John Jordan and Mr. Crook, with their families. The house in which the banquet was held was built on a city lot owned by Ann Hoag, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south side.

The event is related in John Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and some snow on the ground. The event was held on the south side. The menu consisted of ground cherry pudding, which was brought from the lower valley. These were sweetened with beet or carrot syrup. There was no sugar to be had. There were other vegetables and good All supplies were brought from the lower valley, as Brother

practically rebuilt an old building to construct his modern service station.

History of Wasatch

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

"In the summer and fall of 1859," the journal continues, "most all the freight teams enroute to Camp Floyd passed through this valley. As they passed by the teamsters would swap old wagon-covers, seamless sacks, etc., for vegetables and grain. The material we got in this way furnished us with about all the common wearing apparel we could get in those days, and men, though they were well dressed when they had canvas suits, consisting of pants and jumper, made from an old wagon sheet. What boots and shoes we had, though boots were nearly out of the question, we used to preserve, not in a 'mason's jar' but under our arms until we got to the field, when we were glad to 'preserve' our feet in old shoes, for the stubble was too much like pins and needles for our bare feet."

Historian Crook was not without a sense of humor, as proved by the following:

"When the soles of our shoes wore out Bro. Jonathan C. would make us some wooden bottoms. Oh! excuse me, I mean soles."

Wild game was plentiful. A herd of 17 antelope skirting the edge of the settlement, a large bear that wandered right into town and was shot, a herd of elk who came down from the hills and were trapped in the snow and all killed by settlement hunters—these among the recollections of those first years in the valley.

The second winter of the settlement, 1860-61, was about the same as the first one. The following summer, their third, plowing began in April, and the amount of grain planted was doubled over the previous season. Families kept coming in from other settlements and were forced to build on city lots, the old fort by now being completely filled with dwellings.

Military District Organized

In September, 1861, officers came to Heber and organized it into a military district. J. W. Witt was appointed major and John Hamilton adjutant over the division of militia, with Thomas Todd captain of infantry.

"William M. Wall was a great hand for conducting sham fights, we had many a one in the middle of the fort, cavalry against infantry. I remember one time we were having a sham fight, the infantry was charging the cavalry when the horses got frightened and ran across the ditch, Charles Thomas' horse threw him and put his shoulder out of joint and he is still lame in that arm. There was no more sham fighting that day."

During the winter of 1861-62 a home drama association was formed, with Elisha Everett Sr. manager and John Hamilton, secretary. They used quilts and blankets for wings and scenery. Later they began building a stone hall in which to stage plays, but it was never finished because of friction which developed when some claimed they were building a theater before they built a house of worship. The company continued, however, and gave plays year after year.

"By 1862 our population had increased to near 1,000 souls. Midway had three small settlements. Quite a few families had settled on Center creek, some at Charlesion, some in Round Valley and some up at Hailstone."

—THE WASATCH WAVE—

Indian War Reaches Wasatch

The Black Hawk Indian war spread to Wasatch valley in 1866. The three settlements in the west side of the valley merged into one and the name of the town, Midway, resulted. They settled at the middle community and built a fort.

Although no white person was killed or wounded by Indians in this valley during the Black Hawk war much stock was driven off, killed and stolen. The threat was always present and only constant vigilance and armed strength prevented blood shed. More than 250 men were organized into active military duty, in two companies of cavalry and four of infantry. William Wall's cavalry had several brushes with the Indians, and in one skirmish they killed two redskins and wounded several more. Raids on cattle and other stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the north by Summit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1889, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, having a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural population, with farming and stock raising as the chief occupations, continued until the mid 1880s when the county began to open and employ large numbers of men in the late 19th century. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch county still remains a leading livestock center, however, dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine sheep are perhaps the county's best known product, an industry has been built up from the days of the valley's settlement.

Wasatch county stands today as one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

MR. MERCHANT
SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 17 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to everyone, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small, and it was impossible to invite more. Those invited were Thomas Rasband, James and Bessie Carlile, Charles N. Carroll, John Jordan and Mr. Crook, with their families. The house in which the banquet was held was built on a city lot owned by Ann Hooper, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south side.

The event is related in Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and some snow on the ground. The tables were set under the bowery side. The menu consisted of ground cherry pudding, which was brought from the lower valley. These were sweetened with beet or carrot syrup. There was no sugar to be had. There were other vegetables and good apples. All supplies were brought from the lower valley, as Brother ion, some in Round Valley and some up at Hailstone."

Indian War Reaches Wasatch

The Black Hawk Indian war spread to Wasatch valley in 1866. The three settlements in the west side of the valley merged into one and the name of the town, Midway, resulted. They settled at the middle community and built a fort.

Although no white person was killed or wounded by Indians in this valley during the Black Hawk war much stock was driven off, killed and stolen. The threat was always present and only constant vigilance and armed strength prevented blood shed. More than 250 men were organized into active military duty, in two companies of cavalry and four of infantry. William Wall's cavalry had several brushes with the Indians, and in one skirmish they killed two redskins and wounded several more. Raids on cattle and other stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the north by Summit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1889, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, having a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural population, with farming and livestock raising as the chief occupations, continued until the mines began to open and employ great numbers of men in the late 1920's. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch county still remains a leading livestock center, however, with dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine sheep are perhaps the county's best known product, an industry that has been built up from the first days of the valley's settlement.

Wasatch county stands today as one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

Lee did not raise any crop the first year.

"Christmas week was a gay time. After the banquet, a party of young folks arrived, some three or four sleigh loads from Provo City. Most of the young people, especially the boys had been in the valley in the summer and had harvested some grain on Center Creek. There were gay times when they arrived, with dancing and amusements. About New Years they returned home. Then we were left with no mail and no visitors and clear, cold weather prevailed. Snow was about 18 inches deep."

MR. MERCHANT
SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 17 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to everyone, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small, and it was impossible to invite more. Those invited were Thomas Rasband, James and Bessie Carlile, Charles N. Carroll, John Jordan and Mr. Crook, with their families. The house in which the banquet was held was built on the city lot owned by Ann Howarth, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south front.

The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowery outside. The menu consisted of ground cherry pudding, squash was brought from the lower valley. These were sweetened with beet or carrot syrup. There was no sugar to be had. There were other vegetables and good bread. All supplies were brought from the lower valley, as Brother John tened the London wickup, the name London Springs, moving and building occupied the two days, and I think on the of May, Thomas Rastband himself, having only one yoke of oxen, joined our teams commenced plowing.

of 10 was predomin-ly, hence the name and London Springs. The area was also as New London by many.

Named Timpangos
The family of William David-ly was believed to be the first to settle in the valley. His after which he named Timpangos after the mountain, was first white child born in the valley.

about May 20 of the same sum-ber, the settlers arrived. 1859, of the 10 men returned to vo for grain and supplies, were accompanied on their by quite a number of new ers, among them Thomas H. Hyrum Oaks, Martin Oaks, ney Epperson, and others. about the last of May another arrived. More land was sur-ed, and parties came and went summer long acquiring ground, ne stayed to settle, and the with and development of Wa-ch valley had begun. The nsite of Heber was surveyed same summer.

an account is contained in Mr. Some time about the middle of the Deputy Surveyor Jesse Ful-land that had been left for a in site, the starting point be-George W. Clyde's corner. arles N. Carroll and John John Crook were chain bear-ly. The survey was run on the st line of Main street for eight blocks; thence west five and a e blocks; thence north eight icks north to the north field of survey.

This section of land was stak-off in blocks and lots at this ne, the east part of the city e, two months later. A fort e, forty rods square, was also d off at this time. Some par-s m down on the fort line

William Meeks, who has serv- ed as presiding elder until now, resigned in the fall of 1860 and William Wall was chosen to re- place him. He was herding cattle in Round valley, later known as Wallburg, and came to Heber to accept the position. He chose James Laird and John M. Mur-

practically rebuilt an old build- ing to construct his modern ser- vice station.

History of Wasatch

the fort line and a few had built on their city lots.

"In the summer and fall of 1859," the journal continues, "most all the freight teams enroute to Camp Floyd passed through this valley. As they passed by the teamsters would swap old wagon covers, seamless sacks, etc., for vegetables and grain. The mater-ial we got in this way furnished us with about all the common wearing apparel we could get in those days, and men, though they were well dressed when they had canvas suits, consisting of pants and jumper, made from an old wagon sheet. What boots and shoes we had, though boots were nearly out of the question, we used to preserve, not in a mason's jar but under our arms until we got to the field, when we were glad to 'preserve' our feet in old shoes, for the stubble was too much like pins and needles for our bare feet."

Historian Crook was not with out a sense of humor, as proved by the following:

"When the soles of our shoes wore out Bro. Jonathan C. would make us some wooden bottoms. Oh! excuse me, I mean soles."

The second summer of the set- tlers' occupation of Wasatch val- ley, 1860, saw good fortune re- main with them. Crops were good more than doubling the previous

Crook wrote. The fort lines were all filled up by the fall of 1860, with two families to the four rods formerly allotted one, in many instances. There were over 40 families in tlement, 1860-61, was about the same as the first one. The follow- ing summer, their third, plowing began in April, and the amount of grain planted was doubled over the previous season. Families kept coming in from other settle- ments and were forced to build on city lots, the old fort by now being completely filled with dwellings.

(Continued on another page)

Military District Organized
In September, 1861, officers came to Heber and organized it into a military district. J. W. Witt was appointed major and John Hamilton adjutant over the divi- sion of militia, with Thomas Todd captain of infantry.

"William M. Wall was a great hand for conducting sham fights, we had many a one in the mid- dle of the fort, cavalry against in- fantry. I remember one time we were having a sham fight, the in- fantry was charging the cavalry when the horses got frightened and ran across the ditch, Charles Thomas horse threw him and put his shoulder out of joint and he is still lame in that arm. There was no more sham fighting that day."

During the winter of 1861-62 a home drama association was formed, with Elisha Everett Sr. manager and John Hamilton, sec- retary. They used quilts and blan- kets for wings and scenery. Lat- er they began building a stone hall in which to stage plays, but it was never finished because of friction which developed when some claimed they were building a theater before they built a house of worship. The company con- tinued, however, and gave plays year after year.

"By 1862 our population had increased to near 1,000 souls. Mid- way had three small settlements. Quite a few families had settled on Center creek, some at Charles-were organized into active ly duty. In two companies yalry and four of infantry. in Wall's cavalry had sev- brushes with the Indians, 1 one skirmish they killed edskins and wounded sev- here. Raids on cattle and stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wa- satch range, on the north by Sum- mit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1869, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, hav- ing a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 17 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to every- one, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small, and it was impossible to invite more.

Those invited were Thomas Ras- band, James and Bessie Carlie, Charles N. Carroll, John Jordan and Mr. Crook, with their fam- ilies. The house in which the ban-quert was held was built on the city lot owned by Ann Howarth, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south front.

MR. MERCHANT SEE THAT SHE READS YOUR AD IN THESE COLUMNS

The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowery with side. The menu consisted of ground cherry pudding, apples was brought from the lower valley. These were sweetened with beet or carrot syrup. There was no sugar to be had. There were other vegetables and fruit. All supplies were brought from the lower valley, as the ion, some in Round Valley and some up at Hailstone."

Indian War Reaches Wasatch

The Black Hawk Indian war spread to Wasatch valley in 1866. The three settlements in the west side of the valley merged into one and the name of the town, Midway, resulted. They settled at the middle community and built a fort.

Although no white person was killed or wounded by Indians in this valley during the Black Hawk war much stock was driven off, killed and stolen. The threat was always present and only constant vigilance and armed strength prevented blood shed. More than 250 men were organized into active military duty, in two companies of cavalry and four of infantry. William Wall's cavalry had several brushes with the Indians, and in one skirmish they killed two redskins and wounded several more. Raids on cattle and other stock continued through the summer of 1866 and most of 1867. In August of the latter year, the final peace treaty was signed which ended the war in this valley. It is commemorated by the monument on the stakehouse grounds.

Wasatch county was officially created in 1862 by an act of the state legislature, bounded on the west by the summit of the Wasatch range, on the north by Summit county, on the east by the territorial line and on the south by Sanpete county. John W. Witt was the first probate judge.

The ending of Indian troubles in the valley removed the last serious obstacle to growth, and settlers flocked to the valley in the years that followed. In 1889, the Wasatch Wave was started under editorship of William Buys. Its first issue, on file in the Wave office, was dated March 23.

Heber City grew rapidly, having a population of around 2,000 in the first years of the twentieth century. A predominantly rural population, with farming and livestock raising as the chief occupations, continued until the mines began to open and employ great numbers of men in the late 1920's. Since then, the mine payroll has been one of the largest and most important in the county. Wasatch county still remains a leading livestock center, however, with dairying making great strides in the past few years. Fine sheep are perhaps the county's best known product, an industry that has been built up from the first days of the valley's settlement.

Wasatch county stands today as one of the most prosperous regions in the state, with a diversified livelihood of mining, farming and stockraising.

Lee did not raise any crop the first year.

"Christmas week was a gay time. After the banquet, a party of young folks arrived, some three or four sleigh loads from Provo City. Most of the young people, especially the boys had been in the valley in the summer and had harvested some grain on Center Creek. There were gay times when they arrived, with dancing and amusements. About New Years they returned home. Then we were left with no mail and no visitors and clear, cold weather prevailed. Snow was about 18 inches deep."

MR. MERCHANT
SEE THAT SHE
READS YOUR AD
IN THESE COLUMNS

Heber's First Christmas

One third of Heber's families could not get under the same roof for a banquet today, but they did in 1859 at the first Christmas ever observed here.

Six families out of a total of 7 attended a Christmas banquet prepared by Sarah, or "Mother" Lee, as she was known to everyone, according to John Crook's journal of early Heber history. Accommodations were small, and it was impossible to invite more.

Those invited were Thomas Rasband, James and Bessie Carlile, Charles N. Carroll, John Jordan and Mr. Crook, with their families. The house in which the banquet was held was built on the city lot owned by Ann Howarth, a log cabin about 16 feet square with a bowery on the south front.

The event is related in Mr. Crook's journal as follows:

"It was a beautiful day, the sun was shining clear and cold, some snow on the ground. Tables were set under the bowery outside. The menu consisted of ground cherry pudding, squash was brought from the lower valley. These were sweetened with beet or carrot syrup. There was no sugar to be had. There were other vegetables and good bread. All supplies were brought from the lower valley, as Brother John